Case Study

Kathy is an administrative assistant in the Financial Services Department of Professional Business Associates. She often works late to keep up with her heavy workload and is in the office when the night custodial staff comes in to work. James is a friendly night custodian who stops by Kathy's desk any time she is there and shakes her hand. Lately, Kathy has felt uncomfortable with the way he does so because he "holds" the handshake a little too long and calls her "sweetie". The last time Kathy stayed late, James even walked around to give her a hug. Kathy did not reciprocate the hug, but James hugged her anyway. Kathy smelled alcohol on his breath when he did so.

Kathy decided to discuss the matter with her department manager, Mr. Rosen, who said it was not anything she should worry about. When Kathy asked if she should discuss the matter with James, Mr. Rosen said no. He added that James was hired because he is the nephew of the CEO and would thereby be protected.

Kathy comes to you to share her concerns but is worried that her report might affect James' impending retirement plans.

As a Human Resources Manager, how would you handle this situation?
