Case Study

Eddie, a software engineer in the Information Technology Department of Professional Business Associates, takes a software vendor to a late lunch using a company car. He doesn't tell anyone that his driver's license is expired. During lunch, the vendor gives Eddie a CD with a trial version of a new software program for his personal use that is valued at $99. After lunch, the two decide to stay for happy hour. During this time, the men discover they both share a love for guns. Eddie shows the vendor a pistol he carries in his inside coat pocket. Both Eddie and the vendor have three drinks before heading back to the office.

When Eddie turns in the company keys, the fleet manager notices the smell of alcohol. Eddie quickly retreats to his office before the fleet manager can strike up a conversation. The fleet manager inspects the vehicle and notices a dent on the rear bumper. After completing the necessary paperwork, the fleet manager reports the scenario to Eddie's manager and to you.

The following day, the vendor decides Eddie exhibited unethical and potentially dangerous behavior and notifies the HR department.

As Human Resources Manager, how would you handle this situation?
