Case Study

You have been hired as the new payroll clerk because the current director moved to the Human Resource Department.

Needing some assistance from the previous payroll clerk, you send an email requesting the previous documents that were utilized. The response was “they are in the file”. You sent a second email for clarification and received no response. A week later you needed assistance again regarding documents that your supervisor had requested. Again, the response from the previous payroll clerk was “it’s in the file” with no instruction of where this file is or attached documents.

On casual business Friday, with the clarification from your supervisor of what was acceptable attire, your attire was very similar to everyone in the payroll department. As your department goes to lunch, you encounter the previous payroll clerk who stares you up and down and comments “dressed awfully casual today”.

- Since the second email did not receive a reply, what direction should you go to obtain that information?
- Is there some correlation between and personal and business ethics?
- What course of action should you take if your colleagues remain silent?

Critical Behaviors Desired:

There are four issues at play here:

- 1) Open communication
- 2) Professional conversation
- 3) Professional dress
- 4) Personal ethics
