Case Study

You are a new management assistant in the Marketing department. Your desk is directly outside the office of two managers ~~offices~~.

It is the year-end and several vendors have sent complimentary gifts ranging from small gift cards to expense electronics ~~for to~~ show ~~of their~~ gratitude. The managers have asked you to organize an inventory that there are enough gifts for each employee to receive at least one in a raffle. As you perform this task you find that there are 6 extra gifts. You overhear the two managers discussing selecting three of the more expensive gifts a piece prior to the raffle to use for their personal satisfaction.

- As the managers, should they have first choice?
- Is the raffle an appropriate distribution of these gifts or are there alternatives?
- Is it fair?
- Should have you said anything when you heard the comment? And if so, to whom?
- What ethical considerations should be in place for gift acceptance and distribution?

Critical Behaviors Desired:

There are three issues at play here:

- 1) Fairness and equal opportunities*
- 2) Trustworthiness of leadership*
- 3) Professional communication*

The competitor should also address gift acceptance and distribution—not necessarily policy but ethical considerations for potential policy.
