Managing Stress in the Workplace

Many modern workplaces are filled with deadlines, conflicts, technology problems, and demands. These issues often lead to stress and exhaustion. If not managed, stress and exhaustion can take a toll on your body and overall health. Stress is the mental or emotional strain that results from adverse or very demanding situations. Stress in the workplace can improve your concentration, increase your energy, and may help you pay attention; however, continued stress will cease to be helpful and could adversely affect your health, relationships, productivity, and attitude.

In order to manage the way stress affects you and your life, consider these ideas. Use stress to your advantage. When you find yourself in a stressful situation, focus your energy to get through it. If you are nervous about a presentation, channel that energy and use it to give a passionate presentation.

Remove yourself from stressful situations. When you feel your stress level rising, take a quick break. Put the task off until tomorrow, or use your lunch/break time to leave the office. Intermittent breaks can help you focus more clearly. Consider something with physical activity to help you manage stress better.

Get enough sleep. Your body needs sleep to rejuvenate; make sure you are getting enough sleep. Lack of sleep can cause mental and physical fatigue and reduce your performance.

Use your support network. It might be helpful to share your worries with someone outside of work, especially if you use humor. Spend some time talking with a friend.

Externalizing instead of internalizing can be a very helpful way to reduce the way stress affects your health and body.

MANAGING STRESS DO'S AND DON'TS

(QS)

Guideline	Do	Don't
Remove yourself from stressful situations	Take a break, do something physical, and breathe deeply until you feel calm	Put tasks off for too long, ignore physical signs of stress
Use stress to your advantage	Turn the nervous energy into productive energy	Let stress control you
Be aware of your physical responses	Eat a snack, get plenty of sleep, exercise, engage in physical activity	Let hunger contribute to your anxiety, snack on high-sugar junk foods, deprive yourself of sleep

SUBJECT: Managing Stress in the Workplace

As we are all aware, many modern workplaces are filled with deadlines, conflicts, technology problems, and demands. These issues, coupled with concerns at home, can often lead to stress and exhaustion. If we do not manage stress properly, it can take a toll on our overall health. Because the health of our staff is very important to us, we want to educate all members of Professional Business Associates on ideas to help manage the stress that could affect them.

As we begin our office development this month, we are kicking off our focus on wellness. This week we want to help remind our staff on ways to help alleviate stress in the workplace that they may be experiencing. We have finalized our research and created a few documents that will help our employees deal with exhaustion. Please print and distribute the included documents for all members of your departments.

You can learn more about managing stress and exhaustion through our health insurance provider at www.pbahealth.org. Be sure to print the attached report and table for the members of your department.
