State Final Scenario:

You are an employee of PBA Market and have been warned about your excessive absenteeism several times, both verbally and in writing. The written warning included notice that "further violations could result in disciplinary actions," including suspension or discharge.

A short time after the written warning was issued, you called work to say you were not going to be in because your babysitter had called in sick and you had to stay home to care for your young child. Your supervisor told you that you had already exceeded the allowed number of absences and warned that if you did not report to work, you could be suspended. When you did not report for your shift, you were suspended for fifteen days.

In a subsequent meeting, you argued that it was not your fault that the babysitter had canceled and protested that you had no other choice but to stay home. Your supervisor pointed out that you had not made a good-faith effort to find an alternate babysitter, nor had you tried to swap shifts with a coworker. Furthermore, the supervisor said that the lack of a babysitter was not a justifiable excuse for being absent.

- Do you feel the punishment was fair?
- What are some alternative resolutions to the situation?
- What does the employee manual say?
- Are all employees treated equally?
