STATE FINAL SCENARIO:

Dan, a Marketing Analyst for Digital Solutions, has been unhappy for the past year, feeling that advancement opportunities are either very limited or completely unavailable in his current position. Last month, he made the decision to actively pursue other job opportunities with room for advancement and professional growth. Dan has chosen to keep this job search a secret from his current employer and has continued to perform well in his current position.

In recognition of Dan's outstanding job performance and, in private consideration of him as a future Assistant Manager of the Marketing Department, his supervisor signs him up for an out-of-town management training seminar that starts in two days at a substantial financial cost to the company. The registration cost of the seminar is non-refundable; however, the change deadline for the plane tickets and hotel arrangements has not yet occurred and, theoretically, could be changed to another employee, should one be available to attend.

Although a formal offer has not yet been extended to Dan by other employers, he did complete a second, very strong, interview today and feels confident that he will be offered the position within the week.

- What company ethics policies are involved in this scenario?
- Is it ethical for employers to treat employees differently if they know they are pursuing other jobs?
- Is it ethical for employees to pursue other jobs without informing their current employer?
- What decision(s) would you make if you were Dan and why?
